Early Spring Warmth and Your Garden

Garden & Home

This winter has brought us a welcome gift of early spring warmth, and while we are enjoying the sunshine, our plants are confused and thinking it's time to get blooming. This has caused many gardeners to worry about the health of their plants.

The first sign of life has been bulbs sprouting early. Generally, these are safe. Bulbs have a built in mechanism to deal with cold weather, and typically the bloom is protected safe inside the plant at this time. If it looks like there will be a hard freeze, the best thing to do is to cover the plants to conserve heat and protect from harsh wind.

With shrubs and trees, there's a lot less we can do. Fortunately, a hard frost is not likely to kill a tree or shrub that's waking up. At the worst, you may see some damage to the bloom, but the leaves will likely grow and the plant will heal for the next season. If you have a small plant that has buds and can be covered easily, you may be able to prevent some damage.

Most importantly, remember that plants are adaptable and hardy. They have evolved in these conditions and will be able to bounce back. Our advice to you: enjoy the weather, and save your gardening energy for spring!
